What is “Contemplative Research”?

We understand contemplative research to be the scholarly and scientific investigation of meditative and other mind-body practices and their clinical and pedagogical applications. Such research includes the study of traditional and modern techniques that cultivate or focus attention in a sustained fashion with the aims of deepening concentration, tranquility, and insight; broadening our understanding of the many forms of consciousness including nondual awareness, all with the larger goal of promoting well-being.

The spectrum of contemplative research is wide-ranging. It includes work on developing prosocial capacities and dispositions such as empathy, compassion, and kindness; the study of everyday “flow” experiences of absorption in an activity; enactive approaches to the study of cognition; psychological and philosophical inquiry into the nature of mind and the conditions that foster human flourishing; interdisciplinary inquiry into the social and ethical dimensions of contemplative practices, including their relevance to issues of social justice, conflict resolution, and holistic education; phenomenological descriptions of meditative, psychedelic, and otherwise induced states of consciousness, together with scientific investigation of their neurobiological and behavioral correlates, aimed at deriving basic knowledge and evaluating potential clinical applications; and scholarly study of the most profound and life-changing experiences that have been deliberately and systematically cultivated in various religious and philosophical traditions.

Sponsorship allows us to help keep down the cost of meeting registration – a particularly important benefit in view of the emphasis placed on the encouragement given to researchers at the start of their careers.

Complimentary and/or reduced fee registrations are awarded to student members and members from historically challenged socio-economic backgrounds.

All of this could not be achieved without significant support from industry, academia and government.
